Proposals

When we make proposals, we introduce plans which we intend to implement in the future. We make such proposals because we hope to change some existing state or situation. For this reason, we generally defend the proposals we make on the basis of why the current situation needs to be changed, and how our proposals will bring about a change for the better.

The three main components of a complete proposal, then, are: a general statement of the plan you hope to follow, the reasons for proposing a change, and the reasons why you feel your proposals will be successful.
